Marty, a disabled young boy with a special muscle disease, has learned to adapt to his disability (disable). With the motto: live a day at a time, this outgoing teenager is living a good life, busy with all kinds of hobbies. In spite of the fact that he can be clumsy and bump into things, he managed to invent (invent) a computer game last year and now his ambition (ambitious) is to work for a software firm.

However, this didn't come easy. He used to be normal before ten. Then he gradually became so weak that he could only watch football from a bench. Finally he had to give up his dream of playing (play) professional football and representing his country in World Cup. After a billion tests, no diagnosis could be given (give). He didn't know what the future held. His classmates would laugh at him for being out of breath after a short run. In addition, his education suffered as well.

After struggle and hard work, he is now accepted and is stronger psychologically (psychological) and more independent. He expects others to stop feeling sorry, making fun of or ignoring the disabled. Instead, he hopes that people accept them as who they are and encourage them.

My Silver Lining

We should never learn to be brave and patient if there were only joys in the world. Although the world is full of suffering, it's also full of the overcoming of it.

~ ~ Helen Keller
