An online voluntary activity

In an attempt to educate more people how to prevent the novel coronavirus and protect themselves,an online voluntary activity was organized by our group of volunteers during the Spring Festival.

Knowing that many people were too anxious about the outbreak of the disease, we invited professional experts to give online instructions,ranging from the correct way to wash hands to indoor body-building exercises.In addition,we take turns to answer people's questions online,which not only eased their anxiety but also provided them with confidence.More importantly,we appealed to people to minimize outdoor activities,avoid crowded places and wear a mask,in the form of videos,pictures,cartoons,etc.

This activity was highly praised, which gave more people confidence that the novel virus could be controlled and finally defeated with our joint efforts.

One possible version:

Then came the dreaded moment. Clutching the roses, Elizabeth got up the courage to walk slowly to the spot where Ms. Wolff was standing. Elizabeth opened her mouth, mouthing the very six words. But no sound came out. She tried again, only to feel the words stuck in her throat. She began to see dots in front of her eyes. She took a deep breath and murmured, "Beaut... Beautiful flowers for a beautiful performance!" With this, she tentatively presented the roses to Ana Wolff, who, in return, wrapped Elizabeth in a big hug.

The audience cheered and clapped loudly for them. Through the glare of the footlights, Elizabeth could see the crowd smiling. Backstage, Elizabeth told Ms Wolff about her stage fright. "That is how I feel every time I go onstage! You need to swallow that fear and go out here anyway," said Ms. Wolff, smiling. "Just the way you did tonight." Then the great Ana Wolff gently drew a single red rose from her bouquet and gave it to Elizabeth. "Here is a beautiful flower for a brave girl."
