第一节：

Last week, our school launched a tree planting activity, calling on students of all grades to actively participate in it. I jumped at the opportunity.

On Tree Planting Day, we gathered at the school gate and took a coach to the destination. The teachers first showed us how to plant trees. Then we were divided into small groups to fulfill our task. We dug a hole, lay a seedling in it and put the soil back before we watered it. Finally, we used some sticks and strings to hold the newly planted tree in place.

Tired as I felt, I considered it a meaningful activity. I learned an important life lesson: harvest and comfort can't coexist. The same is true for study.

第二节：

Three weeks passed, no reply from LA. My son sighed with disappointment when carefully checking the mail box. Seeing his drooping head and gloomy eyes, I couldn't help blaming myself for putting my easy trust on a total stranger and expecting him to realize my son's wish. After all, in recent days no one would like to take the trouble to do this for an encounter with nothing in return. We had given up on the star map when a big white envelope marked "U.S." unexpectedly reached us one afternoon. Inside the envelope was a small green package and a small note saying, "Forgive delay. Here's a map for your son. Kind regards, LA!"

I held the package and the note in my hand, speechless. The whole thing was totally to my surprise. I had previously thought that an act of kindness from a stranger would not really exist. However, what I was experiencing right now proved that I was wrong. I was deeply ashamed of myself because I shouldn't have assumed the driver's intention to help someone in need. When my son saw the star map in my hand, his eyes sparkled with great excitement. Seemingly incapable of containing his joy, he hugged me tightly and exclaimed, "I can't believe, dad, you did it!" I gently touched his head, explaining, "If you never trust anybody, you'll never find the good man."
