Dear George,

I'm thrilled to hear that you've begun your six-month exchange program here in China. While you must be excited about your new life here, it's only natural to feel a little overwhelmed by cultural differences. Many exchange students go through the exact same thing.

If you ever feel awkward or confused because of cultural gaps, don't hesitate to open up about your true feelings. This will help others understand you better and ease your discomfort. You may also consider exploring the city centre with friends on weekends. Taste local food or strike up conversations with locals. Most of them are warm-hearted and willing to answer your questions or listen to your stories.

I believe you will gradually get used to the new environment. If you ever need support, just write to me.

All the best,

Li Hua

第二节（满分 25 分）

Paul looked up from his phone. He gave a start, but soon he calmed down. "Just a quick message," he said with a casual shrug, as if testing how far he could go. A few students turned in their seats, sensing what might follow. I met his eyes and smiled, not unkindly. "Then you remember what we agreed on." A ripple of laughter spread across the room. "Go on, Paul!" someone urged, and others joined in, their voices light but insistent. He hesitated for a moment, clearly weighing his options, but there was no graceful way out. Blushing, Paul dialed the number, hit the speaker button almost defensively, and set the phone down on his desk.

Mr. Davis's voice came through on speakerphone, sounding quite surprised. "Aren't you supposed to be in class?" Embarrassed, Paul replied, "Yes, but I'm just calling to say I love you." There was a brief silence before Mr. Davis continued, "I hope this isn't a prank...or is it a punishment?" The whole class erupted in laughter. Paul let out an awkward chuckle and quickly ended the call. For the rest of the period, every time I glanced at him I could see I had his full attention — and everyone else's, too. My approach had paid off, and I had a feeling that Mr. Davis would love it, too.
